Saiver manual.The present invention relates to an intervertebral implant to be installed in the intervertebral space between two adjacent vertebrae, which implant includes an essentially wedge-shaped body having a lower face and an upper face with a front corner and a back corner in the direction of insertion and a front side and a rear side, which wedges into the intervertebral space and is connected to the vertebrae by screws. Intervertebral implants of the type described above are known from the prior art in various shapes. Such implants are particularly suitable for use in situ, i.e., without completely removing the vertebrae, and not for example as part of an endoprosthesis which can only be implanted when the vertebrae are at least partly removed. Intervertebral implants, with a similarly shaped body and similar functions, are
