The extent of an ideology in its effects becomes more noticeable the more it is outflanked on all sides by the development of the corresponding world situation. On closer examination it becomes obvious that in fact Marxism is a truly widespread product of capitalism as it now exists. Marxism is its particular expression, its peculiar ideology. "The Marxist is only what he is, a capitalistic society." Marxism is the ideology of the social conditions of our time. It takes account of them and tries to do something about them in a certain way. The fate of our time is the consummation of a development of which Marx was one of the most important pre-suppositions. Marxism was not itself the thing, it was the anticipatory moment of its coming. It is therefore the ideology of modern, bourgeois man. Marxism is the ideology which concerns itself with the consequences 595f342e71
